The original test footage for Shrek, created in 1995, showed a darker and more menacing version of the character. In the test, a bandit threatens Shrek with a knife, but Shrek responds by pulling on the bandit's rope, sending him flying into the sky. The animation was met with disapproval from Jeffrey Katzenberg and other officials at DreamWorks, leading to the firing of the Propellerheads, the team behind the film. The test footage remained unknown until 2018 when it was sold on eBay for $3,000. 1. Anyone can use this content for any purpose, including commercial ones. 2. When conceptualizing the artwork for Shrek, DreamWorks producers wanted to test the crew's understanding of working with 3-D animation. Jackson envisioned a scene where Shrek walks down a medieval alley and encounters a mugger, helping to reveal his character and strength against adversity. The team designed various shots and angles for the dark atmosphere, aiming to create suspense leading up to the encounter. As Chris Farley joined the project as the voice of Shrek, the animation test shifted towards being more "broad and comical," influencing the characters' movements through a combination of techniques like motion capture and facial morphing. However, concerns arose about the film's visual style, with many finding it too dark for a ninety-minute movie. Despite these reservations, the crew voted to complete the test as initially intended. The final result led to most of the team, including Jackson, being let go from the project. Once the test was screened, the decision was made to change direction and create a more romantic story appealing to a wider audience. In 2023, Barry Jackson, the production designer, uploaded the full 38-second test on YouTube. A few years prior, YouTuber "unclesporkums" had uploaded the storyboard version of the animation test with voiced-over lines by himself, mimicking Chris Farley's voice. In 2022, an animator who worked on the test shared a sped-up clip in HD quality, which was later slowed down and zoomed to reveal every frame. Additionally, YouTube user TheSecretLifeOfAliens uploaded clips featuring Shrek's close-up shot and dancing scenes, as well as hijinks with Shrek and the Mugger without original audio. Early concept models for Shrek and The Mugger were discovered on a website, sparking speculation about their potential use in the final animation. VFX supervisor Jonathan Gibbs posted about the video on Twitter, claiming it was part of a more extensive test than what was publicly shown by Jackson. However, recent interviews with Jackson seem to have debunked this claim.
